For a standard university-level English class, it's easy to understand why students who do not plagiarize their essays cannot realistically compete with students who do plagiarize their essays. These days, AI can produce human-level results in a fraction of the time it would take a student to learn, understand, and produce them authentically. The difference is how we treat it as a society. For most people, plagiarism is a significantly easier topic than AI. Yet, the questions haven't changed. Does an academic environment that allows and encourages plagiarism foster creativity or innovation? Would you feel like your work was valued and respected? Would the system have any level of meritocracy? Would you even enjoy studying in such an environment? Why should AI be any different. For me, the answers are exactly the same. I truly appreciate and understand the progressive approach to AI in this class, and I know that the best way to handle it is an incredibly complex discussion. But it troubles me to think that those who genuinely engage in the hard work of learning may end up with the same or even lower marks than those who simply outsource their thinking, and I do not believe it is the kind of work ethic or intellectual environment that university should be encouraging. I could write a book on this topic, but people would not believe a human thought deeply or wrote complex string of statements longer than three sentences—that's how low our standards have dropped.
